Why confidence is not the same as comfort

When Sofia joined an online English group, she expected the lessons to feel easier than school. She imagined that speaking from her room would be less stressful than speaking in front of classmates. The first lesson proved the opposite. Because the group was small, the teacher asked everyone to respond several times. Sofia knew many grammar rules, but she paused whenever she had to express a personal opinion.

After a month, she noticed a pattern. Her problem was not a lack of knowledge; it was the habit of waiting until a sentence was perfect. The teacher began giving tasks with time limits: thirty seconds to prepare, one minute to speak, and then a short correction. Sofia still made mistakes, but she became more willing to try. By the end of the course, she understood that confidence grows through repeated controlled difficulty, not through avoiding uncomfortable tasks.
